

Dear EU citizen,

Were you granted status under the EU Settlement Scheme, only to be told years later that the Home Office believes it was granted "in error"?

We're hearing this from more and more EU citizens and their family members,. For some, it means their pre-settled status will simply be allowed to expire. For others with settled status, it means being told they can no longer use it to sponsor a family member.

Crucially, in these cases the Home Office often doesn't give people the same chance to challenge the decision, or to argue that removing their status would be disproportionate.

This is having a devastating impact on people's lives. We are hearing from people where it is affecting their ability to access healthcare, rent, work, travel etc.

We have heard from dozens of people whose health is suffering from the stress that this is causing.

What does "granted in error" mean?

The EUSS was created to protect the rights of EU citizens living in the UK before the end of the Brexit transition period and their family members. Millions of applications were processed in the early days of the scheme, often at enormous speed. Now, the Home Office is revisiting some of those decisions years later.

We're seeing cases where people were EU citizens before the crucial cut-off date but only got documentary evidence later, cases where people met the requirements but weren't asked for a particular document, and cases where people were granted status at a caseworker's discretion, having supplied everything that was asked of them in good faith. In many of these cases, the Home Office accepted the person's circumstances and granted status, only for a different caseworker, years later, to reach a different conclusion. People who absolutely met the requirements for EUSS, are now being denied their rights promised under the Withdrawal Agreement.

Why this matters

Normally, when the Home Office wants to curtail or remove someone's status, there should be a chance to respond, and a proportionality assessment. When the Home Office instead says status was granted "in error," we're seeing a different approach, one with far fewer safeguards. For people with pre-settled status, this can mean the Home Office simply lets their status run out, with no assessment at all of whether it is proportionate to do so.

We're taking the Home Office to court

We believe people who were granted status in good faith shouldn't lose their rights years later because the Home Office has changed its mind. They must have a meaningful opportunity to challenge the decision, and all safeguards in the Withdrawal Agreement must apply, whatever label the Home Office puts on the process.

That's why the3million is launching legal action to challenge the Home Office's approach to "grants in error". It's about whether the Home Office can grant someone status, let them build their life around it, and then quietly take away their rights years later.
